Day 1: How Tele Sales Works and How You Prepare a Session

How to Use This Guide

This is Day 1 of a five-day self-study course. You work alone, at your own pace, with a phone and something to write with. Read a section, then stop and do the small task it gives you. Do not read the whole guide first and practice later. The practice is the point.

Some tasks ask you to call a friend and role-play. Others ask you to record yourself. A few ask you to notice calls you receive. Pick whichever option fits your situation. You never need a real job, a real customer list or real personal data to do any of this. Every phone number, name and offer in this guide is fictional.

The model answers sit near the end, after the quiz. Write your own answers first. The models are examples, not scripts. Your words should sound like you.

Day 1 is about understanding the job and getting ready before you dial. You will learn what tele sales really is, what you are measured on, and how to walk into a calling session prepared and calm.

Today's Objectives (KASU)

Knowledge: You will know the difference between outbound and inbound tele sales, between B2C and B2B selling, and what each common performance metric is actually telling you about buyer behavior.

Attitude: You will treat preparation and calm as professional skills, not extras. A prepared rep who respects the person on the phone is a professional, not a script reader.

Skill: You will be able to build a short calling list with one true, recognizable reason per contact, and settle your nerves before a session with a slow-exhale breathing routine.

Upskill: You will record yourself reading a first contact aloud and score your own pace, clarity and calm against a simple checklist.

What Tele Sales Really Is

Tele sales means selling by phone. That is the whole definition. It is not reading a script at strangers until one says yes. It is a conversation with another person, at a distance, where you try to find out what they need and whether you can help.

There are two directions a call can travel. Outbound calls are the ones you make. You call people who asked to be contacted, past customers, or people on approved lists. Inbound calls are the ones you answer. Someone rings in about an offer, an advert or an email they received.

There are also two kinds of buyer. B2C means you sell to individuals. Examples are mobile plans, insurance, internet subscriptions and education courses. B2B means you sell to small businesses. Often that means booking a meeting with a decision-maker, or selling a simple service like a cleaning contract or a delivery service for a small shop.

Practice example: A B2C outbound call might go to someone who requested a callback about a mobile plan. A B2B outbound call might go to a small accounting firm to book fifteen minutes with the owner about a payroll service. Both are tele sales. The buyer, the pace and the goal are different.

Here is the psychology behind the whole job. Most people you call are busy and slightly guarded. An unexpected call feels like an interruption, and the brain treats interruptions as a small threat. Your first job is never to sell. Your first job is to earn the next thirty seconds. When you do that, the guard comes down a little, and a real conversation becomes possible.

The core idea is simple: a good rep earns the next thirty seconds instead of demanding them. You listen more than you talk. You respect a real no. Every call ends with a clear next step or an honest close.

Reflect before you move on: Think of one sales call you received in the last month. Did the rep earn your next thirty seconds, or demand them? What exactly did they say that made the difference?

What You Are Measured On, and Why It Matters

New reps worry about one number: sales. In reality, the job is measured on several numbers, and each one tells you something different about how people behave on the phone.

Calls made is the raw count of dials. It tells you about effort and volume. It tells you nothing about quality, so never confuse the two.

Contact rate is how often you actually reach a person rather than a voicemail or no answer. It tells you when people are reachable. It also tells you that most dials will not connect, which is normal, not failure.

Conversations means real two-way talk, not a ten-second brush-off. This is where selling happens. A rep who logs many calls but few conversations is dialing at the wrong times or hanging up too easily.

Conversion is the share of conversations that end in the outcome you wanted: a sale, an order or a booked meeting. This is the number that reflects your skill in listening and matching needs.

Appointments or sales is the count of finished outcomes. It is the result of everything above.

Average order value is the average size of what you sell. It tells you whether you are recommending too little or too much.

Practice example: Assume a rep makes two hundred dials in a week, reaches sixty people, has thirty real conversations, and books six meetings. The contact rate is sixty out of two hundred. Conversion is six out of thirty conversations. None of these numbers are targets. They are only an illustration of how the measures stack.

Why does this matter for buyer psychology? Because each metric maps to a human moment. A dial is a chance taken. A contact is a person deciding whether to stay on the line. A conversation is a person deciding you are worth thirty seconds. A conversion is a person deciding you understood them. When you see the metrics this way, you stop chasing numbers and start improving the moments behind them.

Preparing a Session

A session is a bounded stretch of focused calling, anywhere from thirty minutes to two hours. The difference between a rep who dreads a session and one who is effective is almost always preparation.

You need three things before you dial. One goal. A short list. Notes ready.

One goal means a single clear outcome for the session. Not "make calls." Something like "book three meetings with small businesses" or "contact five past customers about renewing their plan." One goal focuses your energy and makes it easy to know whether the session worked.

A short list means a small number of contacts, each with one true reason you are calling. The reason must be one the person would recognize. "I'm calling because you requested a callback about your plan" is a true reason. "I'm calling to offer you a great deal" is not, because it is about you.

Notes ready means you have, for each contact, their name, what you know about them, the reason for the call, and one question you will open with. Notes are not a script. They are a safety net so you never sound lost.

Here is the psychology. Kahneman (2011) describes two ways of thinking: a fast, automatic mode and a slow, effortful one. A person who requested a callback is expecting you, so their fast mode says "this is fine, I asked for it." A person who did not is in fast mode saying "interruption, be careful." Your true reason flips the second reaction into the first. That is why the reason must be recognizable to them, not just true to you.

Build your list this way:

- ☐ Write your one goal at the top of the page.
- ☐ Add five to ten contacts, no more, so the list stays usable.
- ☐ Next to each name, write the one true reason you are calling.
- ☐ Check the reason against this test: would the person recognize it as fair?
- ☐ Write one open question you will start with.
- ☐ Put your notes where you can see them without shuffling paper.

Practice example: A fictional list might read: Contact one, a past customer whose plan ends this month, reason "your plan is up for renewal." Contact two, someone who filled in a form asking about home insurance, reason "you asked for a quote." Contact three, a small bakery owner referred by another customer, reason "a nearby business suggested I call." Each reason is true and recognizable.

Contact Rules, Briefly

Before you call anyone, you follow the rules. Always follow local law and company policy on who may be called, calling hours, do-not-call requests and call recording notices. Rules differ by place, so learn the ones that apply to you.

Three habits keep you safe and professional. Call only within permitted hours, which usually means normal daytime for the person you are calling. If someone asks not to be called, log the do-not-call request immediately, on the call, not later. If calls are recorded, tell the person at the start in plain words.

Why does this matter beyond the law? Because respect is felt. A rep who calls at a reasonable hour and honors a do-not-call request builds trust in the whole profession. Brehm (1966) showed that when people feel pushed, they resist, often harder than the push. Respecting contact rules is the clearest way to never be the push. Log a do-not-call request immediately, and never describe the request as a problem.

Settling Your Nerves

Nerves are normal. Your heart speeds up, your voice tightens, your pace climbs. The person on the other end hears all of it. Guyer, Fabrigar and Vaughan-Johnston (2019) found that vocal cues like rate, intonation and pitch shape how persuasive a speaker seems. A fast, high, tight voice signals anxiety, and anxiety makes the listener wary.

You cannot will yourself calm in two seconds. You can, however, use your breath. Use The Physiological Sigh (Balban et al., 2023): a breathing pattern of two inhales through the nose in quick succession, a full inhale then a shorter top-up inhale at the peak, followed by one long, slow exhale through the mouth. It is a fast way to calm the body in real time before a hard conversation.

Do it once before you dial, and once more between hard calls. Nobody can see you. You will hear the difference in your own voice on the recording.

Reflect: How does your voice change when you are nervous? Ask a friend to tell you, or listen to a recording of yourself.

Apply It in Your Role

If you are job hunting and have no tele sales role yet: build a fictional list of five contacts, as shown above, for an imaginary mobile plan offer. Assign each a true reason. Then read the first one aloud to a friend on the phone, or record yourself.

If you are new in a tele sales role: use your real calling session structure, but never write real names, numbers or personal data in this guide. Use role-play contacts instead, and keep real notes only in your employer's system.

Either way, notice one inbound sales call you receive this week. Write down what the rep did in the first thirty seconds, and what you felt.

What Would You Say?

Write your answer before reading the model answers.

Situation one: You are about to start a session. Your goal is to book two meetings. Your list has twenty names and no reasons written next to them. What do you fix before you dial?

Situation two: A friend asks, "Isn't tele sales just annoying people until they buy?" Give a short, honest answer in your own words.

Situation three: You feel your heart racing before your first call of the day. Describe exactly what you will do in the ten seconds before you dial.

Key Takeaways

Tele sales is a conversation by phone, outbound or inbound, B2C or B2B. Earn the next thirty seconds; never demand them.

Each metric maps to a human moment. Calls are chances taken. Conversations are trust beginning. Conversion is understanding proven.

Prepare with one goal, a short list with one true, recognizable reason per contact, and notes ready.

Follow contact rules, and log a do-not-call request immediately.

Use The Physiological Sigh to steady your voice before a hard call.

Quiz

Choose the best answer for each question.

1. What is the clearest definition of tele sales?

   A. Reading a script until someone agrees to buy
   B. Selling by phone through outbound calls you make and inbound calls you answer
   C. Calling as many people as possible in a day
   D. Sending offers by email and following up

2. A rep makes many dials but has few real conversations. What does this most likely tell you?

   A. The rep is dialing at poor times or giving up too easily
   B. The rep needs to sell harder
   C. The conversion rate is too high
   D. Nothing, because dials do not matter

3. Which of these is a true, recognizable reason to call someone?

   A. "I'm calling to offer you a great deal today"
   B. "I'm calling because you asked for a quote about home insurance"
   C. "I'm calling to practice my sales skills"
   D. "I'm calling because everyone else is switching"

4. Someone on the call asks not to be contacted again. What do you do?

   A. Ask them to think about it first
   B. Call back next week to check
   C. Log the do-not-call request immediately, on the call
   D. Pass the number to a colleague

5. Why does a fast, tight voice hurt you on the phone?

   A. It makes you sound scripted and bored
   B. It is against calling rules
   C. It makes the call shorter
   D. It signals anxiety, which makes the listener wary

Upskill Challenge

Build your first fictional calling list, then test it with your voice.

Step one: Pick one offer from this guide or invent a simple, fictional one. Write one goal for a session of twenty minutes.

Step two: Build a list of five contacts. For each, write a name, the one true reason you are calling, and one open question. Every reason must pass the test: would this person recognize it as fair?

Step three: Record yourself reading the first contact aloud, as if you were on the call. Keep it under thirty seconds. Do the slow-exhale breathing routine once before you press record.

Step four: Play it back and score yourself on three things. Pace: did you speak slower than you wanted to? Clarity: could a friend understand every word? Calm: did your voice sound settled rather than tight? Write one line on each.

Step five: Phone a friend and role-play the same first contact live. Ask them one question afterward: "Did I sound like I was demanding their time or earning it?"

If you have no one to call, record twice, once nervous and once after the breathing routine, and compare the two.

Model Answers

These are examples, not scripts. Your words should sound like yours.

Situation one model: "I would stop and fix the list first. I'd cut it to five or six names I can actually work well, and write one true reason next to each. I'd add one open question per person, keep my goal at the top, and only then start dialing. A long list with no reasons is just noise."

Why it works: It treats preparation as the job, not an obstacle to dialing, and it keeps the goal visible.

Situation two model: "No, because a good rep calls people who expect to hear from them, gives a real reason, and listens. If someone says no, I respect it and log it. The annoying version is people who ignore that. That isn't the job I'm training for."

Why it works: It answers honestly, names the real reason for the uncomfortable reputation, and separates the professional version from the bad one.

Situation three model: "I'd do the double inhale through my nose, then one long slow exhale through my mouth. Then I'd read my first line and question once, slowly, and dial. I'd rather sound calm than fast."

Why it works: It uses a concrete routine and names the behavior it wants, a settled voice, without needing willpower alone.

Quiz answers:

1. B. Tele sales is selling by phone, in both directions, to individuals and businesses.

2. A. Dials that never become conversations point to timing or giving up too early, not to effort.

3. B. The reason must be true and something the person would recognize as fair to them.

4. C. A do-not-call request is logged immediately, on the call, and is never treated as a problem to solve.

5. D. Vocal cues like pace and pitch carry anxiety, and anxiety makes the listener guarded.
